

ČAS BREZ NEDOLŽNOSTI NOVEJŠE SLIKARSTVO V SLOVENIJI

»Kaj je s sliko danes?« je osrednje vprašanje, na katero meri pregledna skupinska razstava novejšega slikarstva mlajše generacije, torej avtorjev, rojenih v sedemdesetih in osemdesetih letih 20. stoletja, Trenutek vstopa te generacije slikarjev in slikark v institucionalni prostor umetnosti ni nepomemben, saj devetdeseta leta v Sloveniji in svetu predstavljajo izredno produktivno, v marsičem novo, prelomno obdobje, in to ob hkratnem zaznavanju presežnosti preteklih umetnostnih modelov in njihove interpretacije. Pri tem se je slikarstvo kot medij znova znašlo v zahtevnem defenzivnem položaju. S prevlado sodobne umetnosti, kakor se upravičeno opredeljuje razširjeno polje umetnosti, ki se je začela pojavljati v devetdesetih letih 20. stoletja in je na površje prinesla heteronomijo umetnostnih praks, pozicij in mediev (od umetnosti v družbenem prostoru in njenih modelov participatornosti ter različnih oblik relacijske umetnosti do hibridnih praks povezovanja biotehnologije, kibernetike, umetne inteligence in umetnosti ter do pionirskega udejanjanja novih umetnostnih praks na novem polju medmrežja itd.), je slikarstvo znova, kot že tolkokrat od kubizma in avantgard naprej, na videz potisnjeno in ozadje in postavljeno na preizkušnjo.

Slika kot osrednji likovni medij z bogato tradicijo in klasično najvišjim mestom v zgodovini umetnosti novega veka v zahodnem svetu je v premenah umetnosti modernizma zadela ob vse svoje zamisljive meje. Najmočnejša in dolgo prevladajoča paradigma modernistične umetnosti je slika omejila na raziskovanje specifičnosti lastnega medija in avtoreferencialnost. Na tem zoženem polju je modernistična slika doživelja svoje brezstevilne uresničitve, najbolj skrajno z abstraktno sliko, ki je postala nekakšen sveti gral modernistične izkušnje slikarske misli in prakse. Po njej je slikarstvo na več načinov prestopilo svoj (fizični in simbolni) okvir, sestopilo tako v fizično-realni kakor v socialni prostor. Nazadnje se je v pozmem 20. stoletju do konca izpolnila prevlada vizualnosti v vseh porah življenja, tako v javnem in družbenem kakor v zasebnosti in intimi: mediji množične komunikacije posredujejo podobe kot blago in njihova neverjetno učinkovita moč je v spektakelski podobi in atrakciji, skozi katero podoba zlahka postane orodje manipulacije in interpelacije gledalca, oblikuje

TIME WITHOUT INNOCENCE RECENT PAINTING IN SLOVENIA
What is the status of painting today? The question serves as the point of departure for an exhibition of the recent production of the younger generations of painters in Slovenia, i.e. artists born in the 1970s and 1980s who entered the art scene in the late 1990s or at the turn of the millennium. The moment these artists entered the institutional space of art is not without significance; both in Slovenia and globally, the 1990s were an extremely productive and in many ways new, watershed era, a time of general awareness that past art models and their interpretations were over. The phenomenon of the expanded field of art emerged in the 1990s and brought to the fore non-autonomous artistic practices, positions and media, from art in the social sphere to models of participatory art and various forms of relational art, hybrid practices coalescing biotechnology, cybernetics, AI and art, and pioneering works in internet art. This predominance of contemporary art put painting as a medium in a difficult, defensive position; once again, as so many times before since cubism and the historical avant-gardes, it seemed pushed into the background and put to the test.

In the face of the shifts and changes that occurred in art over the 20th century, painting as an eminently traditional medium ran up against all conceivable boundaries, and also managed to transcend them all, moving into physical or social space. The strongest and long-prevalent paradigm of modernist art had limited painting to explorations of the medium and to being self-referential. In this narrow field modernist painting saw countless realizations, most extremely so in abstract painting, which became the holy grail of the modernist experience of painterly thought and practice. Following that, painting transcended its (physical and symbolic) frame in numerous ways, entering both the physical and social space. Finally, in the late 20th century, visuality prevailed in all spheres of life, public, social, private and intimate: mass media used images like commodities, most effectively spectacular and attractive images that could easily be turned into instruments for manipulating and interpellating the spectators, shaping their imagination and desires, politically constituting them and affecting all of their choices, even the most intimate ones. The emergence of media images, literally countless and ubiquitous, endlessly generated and consumed, was the final stage of the "visual turn" that pushed painting into the background relative to the mass-media image, and at the same time placed it in a position where it had to face the challenge of this unprecedented profusion of images.

The challenge of persevering and keeping its place in the internet era proved to be very constructive for painting as a medium. The internet fundamentally altered not only the way information circulates and is accessed, but also our perceptions of the world, reality, mechanisms of power, security, privacy, authorship, property, and the commodification of every conceivable thing, from health and romantic relationships to worldviews and ideas – and painting assumed a productive attitude to this new technology. As time has shown, interest in painting has not died in the era of visual culture, and neither has its production, which seems as lively as ever. This is likely due at least in part to the solid position paintings continue to hold as prestigious commodities on the international art market. While the conditions in Slovenia cannot be compared to those on the global market, the younger generations of artists, symptomatically, produce paintings as though a viable art market existed also in our country. At the same time, the internet as an inexhaustible source and archive of visuals (as well as all other forms of artistic and non-artistic production) that can be accessed synchronously and largely non-hierarchically (even if decreasingly freely and without censorship) has essentially changed our reception of culture, art and their history. Never has access to any image from the archives of human endeavors in any area been both so simple and so unselective, which makes history appear as an unstructured synchronicity, and any value system a mere matter of choice.

The status of painting in the new millennium no longer affords us the innocence of perceiving or conceiving of a painting as a vacant, blank site devoid of memory or history, or the innocence that would allow retreating into the safe haven of the autonomy of an artwork. After the experience of modernist abstraction, it is no longer possible to paint an abstract work without some basic awareness of its history, without knowing that every monochromatic painting is the heir of some other, already existing decision. Nor is it possible – after it has been recognized that a subject is a construction of an ideological system – to harbor the illusion that such a painting can authentically convey a truth that is more than merely a

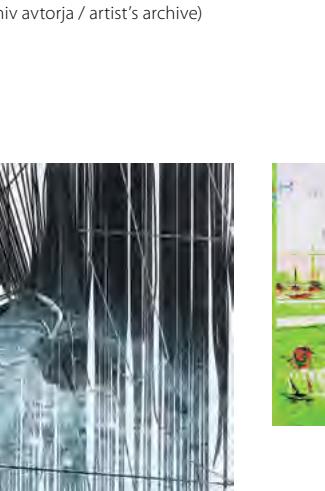

The position of recent painting in the new millennium entails a confrontation with at least two basically new situations. One is the unmanageable plethora of images in all spheres of modern life, which forces painters to take this unprecedented inflation of images into account when conceptualizing a painting. This challenge is not really new; historically, photography had also seemed a fatal rival to painting. What are new are the scope and the power of the visual in the era of visual culture, and the specific political moment of late neoliberal autopagy. The other new situation is the weight of the "historical memory" of painting as a medium; having reached and surpassed its extreme limits, especially of the celebrated tradition of European and American modernism, painting can no longer be conceived of as an innocent tabula rasa, a new beginning, creation ex nihilo (the entire tradition of modernism is based on the tyranny of the new), and neither can it be conceived as a way of expressing personal, intimate experiences, psychological states, empathies, not even those least specific in abstract images, since the presence of all these has been disclaimed in painting and art in general by postmodernist art with its ironic quoting and distancing from its own position of utterance and – in philosophy and psychoanalysis – by the notions of the subject and reality as being fundamentally constructed.

Such use of found images is fundamentally related to the postmodernist art of the 1980s and its use of appropriation of past forms of artistic expression, styles, images, and historical styles. According to some writers on contemporary art,¹ a minor difference nonetheless exists:

Of course, none of this means that painting today is irrelevant, even if it can no longer be measured by some universal standard; on the contrary, it is always authentic to the point that it manages to present in its language, which has become the legitimate language of expression by appropriating and taming all images, the relations and constellations of contemporaneity in such a way that it inevitably exposes it – even if only in fragments – often with an incredible insight into the depths of the social and global crises of our time. And this, after all, has always been the essential purpose of painting.
